The State of Working America: Past as Prologue

With Guest Speaker

Lawrence Mishel, President
Economic Policy Institute

Lawrence Mishel, a nationally recognized economist, will be sharing his reflections on the state of working America on the eve of his retirement as President of EPI, which he has helped build into the nation's premier research organization focused on U.S. living standards and labor markets. Mishel came to the Economic Policy Institute in 1987 as EPI's first research director and later became vice president and then president in 2002. He has played a significant role in building EPI's research capabilities and reputation. He has written and spoken widely on the economy and economic policy as it affects middle- and low-income families. He is principal author of The State of Working America (published biannually by the EPI since 1988), which provides an authoritative overview of U.S. labor markets and living standards.

Prior to joining EPI, Mishel worked as an economist for several unions and taught at Cornell's Industrial and Labor Relations School. Mishel has a PhD in economics from the University of Wisconsin-Madison.
